The present invention relates to a system for dispensing reagents which may be used in the chemical analysis of bio fluids and in particular in the analysis of blood, saliva, urine, feces or other body fluids. In the analysis of bio fluids, the reagents and fluids are generally separated by use of pumps which take samples from a container containing the fluids and deliver them into analysis systems such as clinical chemistry systems, where a series of assay procedures are performed and the results displayed as optical density, color or fluorometric signals. In the field of clinical chemistry, it is common for a single analysis to be performed on several samples, with each sample requiring several reagent additions and a quantitative assessment of the fluid sample before the results are displayed. Most commonly, instruments are used which separate the samples and the reagents and carry out the individual assay procedures on samples which are manually transferred to the instrument, but systems have also been described in which the operator makes a sample transfer directly into a cassette in which reagents are located. In this arrangement, the flow of reagents in the cassette can be controlled and a direct measurement of the concentration of the reagents can be made. One such system for dispensing reagents with the cassette is the Gen-Probe System (trademark of the present assignee) which is described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,867,950. In systems such as this which are designed for single use and disposable, an analysis requires constant operator observation and manual handling, which is not suitable for clinical chemistry analysis. There remains a need for a system for use in analyzing body fluids which is capable of handling a number of samples and which can automatically perform several assay procedures on the samples. The present invention is directed to a system for dispensing reagents to be used
