New insight in the pathogenesis of small-bowel Crohn's disease. Crohn's disease is thought to have an autoimmune basis. We postulated that small-bowel inflammatory disease may occur as the result of a chronic response to pathogen-associated molecular patterns (PAMPs) associated with microbes. Additionally, innate immune recognition is enhanced by cytokine-mediated inflammation. To model PAMP-induced small-bowel inflammatory disease, we used a well-established Rag1-deficient mouse model, in which mice are sensitized with intraperitoneal injections of PAMPs associated with gut commensals or Escherichia coli. The gut epithelium showed a strong inflammatory response to PAMPs, which developed as an immune response to
