The warning was delivered by a pair of US generals and authorised by the Central Command chief, General Joseph Votel, to ensure the referendum goes ahead in Kurdish-controlled

Kirkuk, according to the New York Times. Just in case Donald Trump had his doubts about the referendum results, Washington has also called for the creation of a new federal police force and the deployment of 30,000 troops in Iraq to maintain security in a new state run by President Barzani. The US has also made it very clear it will not let the Kurds gain control over Kirkuk - a provincial capital, rich in oil and housing Kurdish families, which is highly contested territory between the Kurdistan Regional Government (KRG) of northern Iraq and the Islamic State (ISIS), which has its own militia that controls Kirkuk. There are fears the city could turn into a battleground for revenge attacks in the coming months. The Kurdish region has pressed on with plans to hold a referendum on independence from the rest of Iraq on September 25, despite violent protests by the government in Baghdad and accusations that the vote has been planned to undermine the unity of the country. Under the terms of the referendum, an independent Kurdistan would include both the oil-rich city of Kirkuk, and other disputed territories such as the city of Erbil, currently controlled by the KRG.
