I run an Intel's Washington-based think tank The Washington Free Beacon filed a lawsuit in federal court this morning against the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) and Chairman Ajit Pai in an attempt to block the deregulatory move. The filing is in response to an FCC rule published in the Federal Register on Wednesday allowing more companies to own multiple broadcasting properties, a clear sign that new FCC commissioners are moving towards giving more individual owners more control over a company. "The FCC will use this rule to its advantage by allowing companies with complex business structures to own up to a third station for profit," the Free Beacon warned in its lawsuit. "Under the plan, multiple stations could be purchased or merged, and licensees need not be economically separate to be consolidated. At the FCC, the big studios aren't yet blind to the opening." The move was immediately met with criticism from conservatives, who said it will lead to a loss of competition, will lead to higher cable bills and will diminish the value of other media companies. Pai's move is being criticized on multiple levels. It's being criticized by Hollywood for hurting the industry as well as letting Hollywood control what content is streamed to the public. It's also being criticized by liberals who are questioning a move that will affect the cost of government-approved news. It's also being considered a distraction from the Russia probe. "We're willing to work with the FCC to ensure consumers have an accurate and reliable source of news," the Free Beacon's senior legal counsel Lee Thompson told Breitbart News. "We have filed suit in order to protect the First Amendment and the public interest." The Free Beacon also filed a letter to the FCC on Wednesday, arguing that the move is unconstitutional for a number
