In a series of 21 cases, we have made a tracheal registration of the blood flow velocity using the Doppler technique on the circle of Willis (AJDD) and the ascending aorta (AAoDD). 18 patients were treated with corticotherapy for arterial hypertension and pneumonia. In all cases studied, the blood flow velocity has increased in the AAoDD. In the next group, all 14 cases of Takayasu-disease were taken into consideration, and the blood flow velocity of the AAoDD as well as of the AJDD remained constant. Thus, we consider it unlikely, that the increase of the blood flow velocity is a general phenomenon of aortic insufficiency, but we suppose that the cortic

The invention concerns an electrical machine, in particular a brushless motor, having a base body, a housing and a rotor, which rests on a stationary part of the housing and is rotatable about a rotation axis, and having a stator, the coils of which being arranged in a slotting. In electrical machines of this type, especially brushless motors, stator windings are attached to, for example, printed circuit board, often PCBs, in a slotting. They are connected to the electronics, which serve for controlling the rotational position of the rotor relative to the stator. The most modern applications are equipped with electronic control systems for electric drives. A stator wound with exciting coils as well as with single-phase and two-phase signal output windings is provided. A brushless DC motor with a housing that contains a stator winding arranged in a receiving space thereof is known, for example, from the DE 101 36 643 A1. With a frame in the housing, the stator winding is fixed to the housing. The stator windings are arranged in pairs, by which they have to be guided on a stator winding connection, which is also often referred to as the stator leadframe. The stator windings are fixed, for example, on the stator leadframe 6d1f23a050
